Oklahoma Prison Series

The Oklahoma City AP is putting the finishing touches on a multi-part series on Oklahoma's overcrowded prison system, including an overview of the issue, the history of the problem, interviews with guards and inmates, a news-maker interview with the head of the state corrections department and a discussion of approaches that have been suggested to ease the problem. The series, together with photos and sidebars, will move in advance for use beginning Aug. 12.

From the AP Staff

Tulsa Correspondent Justin Juozapavicius

Justin Juozapavicius did profiles on Cherokee chief Chad Smith, whose tribe has voted to end tribal membership for descendants of slaves the tribe once owned, and on Bill Bartmann, a Tulsa businessman who amassed a billion-dollar fortune only to lose it.

He also reported that a proposal for a $200 million beef plant in the Oklahoma Panhandle appears to be going nowhere months after groundbreaking was first planned.

In a story that moved nationally, Juozapavicius reported that after nearly a year of legal battles, a judge had decided Oklahoma State University can acquire through eminent domain the final piece of property it needs for a $316 million athletic village.

Newsman Sean Murphy reported that an annual survey showed that 21 percent of Oklahoma's children were living in poverty.

Murphy also covered flooding around the state and reported that Love's Travel Stops & Country Stores has settled a federal lawsuit filed on behalf of a cashier who claimed she was discriminated against.

In the latest of a series of stories Capitol Correspondent Ron Jenkins has done on lobbyists this year, he analyzed ethics commission reports and wrote about gifts elected officials received in the first six months of 2007, including watches, cash, expensive meals and concert and game tickets.

Jenkins followed up with a story about how some lobbyists use vague terms in their reports, such as "event" instead of "Billy Joel concert," seemingly to cover up the specific gift given to the lawmaker.

Jenkins did a Sunday analysis piece on concerns that blue-collar families are being priced out of attending college in Oklahoma because of tuition raises.

Jenkins had a scoop about a program that gives intense attention to serious offenders before they are released from prison. The program is aimed at reducing the recidivism rate. The story resulted from a newsmaker interview with the head of the state corrections department.

Jenkins reported that an investigation into an embezzlement case at the Oklahoma Tax Commission had expanded, with the attorney general's office requesting an investigation for criminal misconduct.

Newsman Jeff Latzke

Jeff Latzke reported that authorities raided a horse racing operation suspected of running illegal races just north of the Oklahoma-Texas border, arresting 100 people. He also reported from Stillwater on the improvements being made to Boone Pickens Stadium. He also covered the World Cup of Softball in Oklahoma City.

Newsman Murray Evans

Murray Evans was on top of the coverage of the NCAA ruling that the University of Oklahoma must erase its wins from the 2005 season and lose two scholarships for breaking NCAA rules.

Newsman Tim Talley

Tim Talley went to far northeastern Oklahoma and carried the national byline on stories about severe flooding throughout the region. He also was first to report that new laws approved by the state Legislature would add 900 prisoners to the population of inmates in Oklahoma's already-crowded prisons. The story was carried with his byline in Oklahoma's two largest members, The Oklahoman and the Tulsa World.

Editors: Please forward the following letter to your Ad managers:

Dear advertising professional,

The Associated Press would like your guidance on how to serve your publication, your readers and your advertisers better.

In recent months, we have heard from newspaper ad managers that they would like more editorial content online to allow them to sell more ad space in key verticals such as health, fitness, auto and homes. They tell us they have more ad demand than they have ad space, and they need more content to take advantage of that revenue potential.

Below are links to two online surveys -- one is intended for print and online ad professionals at individual newspapers, and the second is for those working at a newspaper group level. Could you please take about 10-15 minutes to tell us more about your needs and how AP might help you?

Individual newspaper ad manager survey: <http://www.zoomerang.com/survey.zgi?p=WEB2262U45DMZ4>

Newspaper group ad manager survey: <http://www.zoomerang.com/survey.zgi?p=WEB226EUFQBTV>

We appreciate your help gauging content/inventory needs in your market, both on your main Web site and any associated niche sites. We hope you will participate before our deadline, Aug. 17, and that you will forward this request to anyone else in your organization you think should offer input.

If you have any questions, I invite you to contact me or Brenna Sniderman, research manager in AP's strategic planning department: bsniderman@ap.org.
